

Enlarging the Heart*

Msgr. Fernando Ocáriz Prelate of Opus Dei

On the tenth anniversary of Harambee, Bishop Javier Echevarría gave a conference on The Christian Heart, Motor of Social Development. [1] As the same initiative celebrates its twentieth anniversary, and in the framework of this day of dialogue about social innovation, I would like to continue my predecessor's reflections. In light of the social doctrine of the Church and the message of St. Josemaría, I will consider the social dimension of the Christian vocation.

Ten years ago, Don Javier reminded us that the dialogue between Jesus and a doctor of the Law expresses the inseparability of love for God and love for others: “when a doctor of the Law asked him which was the first commandment, our Lord did not limit himself to indicating that love for God is the first and greatest commandment. He included the need to love one's neighbor in the first commandment (cf. Mt 22:35-39).”[2]

It is important to keep the relational dimension of the person in mind. Benedict XVI, in the encyclical Caritas in veritate, writes that “as a spiritual being, the human creature is defined through interpersonal relations. The more authentically he or she lives these relations, the more his or her own personal identity matures.” This reality “requires a deeper critical evaluation of the category of relation” so that “man's transcendent dignity [can be] properly understood.”[3]

All of you, in very different ways and from different perspectives, are professionally dedicated to caring for and dignifying people, especially those most in need. You know from experience that, although institutions and structures are necessary, to achieve true integral development we need encounters between persons, creating contexts and conditions within which development can take place, and giving the person the opportunity to perfect him or herself in all his or her dimensions. As disciples of Jesus Christ, we are called by a new title — “Christian” — to care for people, to care for the world.

What do we see in the world? Together with new possibilities for human development due to advances in healthcare, technology, communications and so many inspiring examples, we see injustices and wounds from which humanity bleeds. “In today’s world, poverty presents many faces: sick and elderly people treated with indifference, the loneliness felt by many abandoned people, the drama of refugees, and the destitution in which a large part of mankind lives, often as a result of injustices that cry out to Heaven.”[4]

As I also told you in a letter in 2017, “we cannot be indifferent to any of these things”; we are all called to exercise ‘the creativity of charity’ in order to bring the balm of God’s tenderness to all our brothers and sisters who are in need.”[5]

When human beings ignore or neglect their condition as children of God, all their relationships are affected: with themselves, with others, and with creation. As Pope Francis has said, interdependence becomes dependence: “we lose this harmony of interdependence and solidarity.”[6]

We are jointly responsible for taking care of the world, establishing relationships founded on charity, justice, and respect, especially overcoming the disease of indifference. St. John Paul II wrote: “Yes, every man is his ‘brother’s keeper,’ because God entrusts us to one another.”[7]

Many of the initiatives you represent began under St. Josemaría’s inspiration. And many of you, moved by the same inspiration, work in organizations of different types and focuses because you felt impelled to “do something,” not to sit still with your arms crossed.

It is at the heart of the spirit of Opus Dei to turn ordinary realities into a place of encounter with God and service to others; it is the aspiration of mature people, professionally competent and sensitive to others, seeking to make the world a more just and fraternal place. “Passionately loving the world” means knowing it, caring for it, and serving it.

St. Josemaría summarized the approach to social needs in a letter published in the 1950s: “Christians cannot be individualists who forget about the needs of others. Nor can Christians live selfishly and turn their backs on the world; they are essentially social, responsible members of Christ’s Mystical Body.”[8]

Following the lead of the founder of Opus Dei, in this session I will focus on four dimensions: spiritual, professional, personal and collective.

The spiritual dimension

It might seem utopian to think that we are capable of doing something to alleviate the suffering of humanity. However, we know that it is Jesus who bears the burden of human pain. The wounds in his side, on his hands, and on his feet are reminders of the wounds of the world. And Jesus has told us: “Whatever you did for one of these, you did for me.”^[9]

The path of identification with Christ transforms the human heart and opens it to charity. Union with our Lord, in the sacraments and in prayer, leads us to discover our neighbors and their needs and to pay less attention to ourselves. Charity changes our way of viewing others. “The charity of Christ is not merely a benevolent sentiment for our neighbor; it is not limited to a penchant for philanthropy. Poured out in our soul by God, charity transforms from within our mind and will. It provides the supernatural foundation for friendship and the joy of doing what is right.”^[10]

Some time ago, in a letter, I invited you to ask God to enlarge our hearts, to give us a heart to the measure of His, “so that there enter into it all the needs, pains and sufferings of the men and women of our time, especially the weakest.”^[11] A prayerful heart, in the middle of the world, supports and accompanies others in their needs.

Identification with Jesus opens us to others' needs. At the same time, contact with those in need leads us to Jesus. As St. Josemaría wrote: “A friend of ours used to say: ‘The poor are my best spiritual book and the main motive of my prayers. It pains me to see them, and in each one of them, Christ. And because it hurts, I realize I love him and love them.’”^[12]

Jesus had a predilection for the poor and suffering, but he also wanted to suffer need and to be a victim himself. In those who are suffering, we glimpse Jesus who speaks to us, as Pope Francis reminded us: “The poor, always and everywhere, evangelize us, because they enable us to discover in new ways the true face of the Father.”^[13] From the time of the early Church, it has been understood that the Gospel message is based on concern for the poor and that it is a recognizable sign of Christian identity and an element in its credibility.[14]

The professional dimension

We wish to place Christ at the heart of all human activities, sanctifying professional work and the Christian's ordinary duties. This mission is carried out in the street, in society, especially through work. St. Josemaría reminds us of "the value of ordinary work, which can be a highly effective means of loving and serving God and others, whether it stands out in others' eyes or is lowly from a human point of view." And he invites everyone "to work in the way they personally see fit to eliminate intolerance and to make society more just." [15]

For those who wish to follow Christ, all work is an opportunity to serve others, especially those most in need. There are professions in which this social impact is more immediate or evident, as in your case, working in organizations focused on improving the living conditions of disadvantaged people or groups. But this dimension of service is not just for some; it must be present in any honest work.

From the time when St. Josemaría began to spread his message, he used to say that, to sanctify the world, it was not necessary to change one's place, profession, or environment. It is a matter of changing oneself, whatever the place.

Charity and justice converge in the Christian ideal of work. Far from the logic of "success," service to others is the best criterion for a Christian's work performance. Satisfying the demands of justice in professional work is a lofty and ambitious goal; fulfilling one's own obligations is not always easy, and charity always goes further, asking each person to generously go out of him or herself for others.

In the parable of the Good Samaritan, the innkeeper remains in the background: all we are told is that he acted professionally. His conduct reminds us that the exercise of any professional task gives us an opportunity to serve those in need.

At times, the temptation to "take refuge in work" could appear, in the sense of not discovering work's transformative social dimension, conforming ourselves to a false spiritualism. Sanctified work is always a lever for the transformation of the world, and the usual means by which the changes that dignify people's lives are brought about, so that charity and justice truly permeate all relationships. The work thus accomplished will be able to contribute to purifying the structures of sin,[16] making them into structures within which integral human development is really possible.

Faith helps us to maintain our confidence in the future. As St. Josemaría assured us, “our apostolic work will contribute to peace, to the collaboration of people with each other, to justice, to avoiding war, to avoiding isolation, to avoiding both national and personal selfishness. It will do so because everyone will realize that they are part of the whole great human family, which is directed by God's will towards perfection. In this way we will help remove the all too common anxiety and fear of a future marked by fratricidal resentments. In addition, we will strengthen in souls and in society peace and harmony: tolerance, understanding, mutual relations, love.”[17]

The personal dimension

The message of Opus Dei urges us to strive for the transformation of the world through work. This also includes having compassion, like the Samaritan,[18] as a requirement of love, which brings the law (“what is required”) to its fullness.[19] Love makes our freedom ever more willing and ready to do good.

St. Josemaría wrote, in a letter dated 1942: “The wider spread of social remedies for the plagues of suffering and destitution — which make it possible to achieve humanitarian results today that could not have been dreamed of in other times — will never be able to supplant the efficacious tenderness, both human and supernatural, of immediate, personal contact with our neighbor; with this poor person in a neighborhood nearby, with this sick person living in pain in an immense hospital [...]”[20]

We have before us a vast panorama in the family and in society, and those with a big heart will try earnestly to care for their elderly parents, to give alms, to take an interest in their neighbors' problems, to pray for a friend overwhelmed with worry, to visit a sick relative in the hospital or at home, to stop and talk to a person they sees regularly who is living on the street, to listen patiently, etcetera, etcetera.

It is not normally a matter of adding new tasks to the ones we already perform; it is rather a matter of trying to make manifest, from our own identity, Christ's love for others. The question of charity is not only about what I have to do but, first, who I am for the other and who the other is for me.

In this daily cultivation of solidarity, we find ourselves with others, and so others' needs also become a place of encounter between people of good will, Christians or non-Christians alike, united in facing situations of poverty and injustice.

This dialogue with necessity and vulnerability will surely bear fruit in greater sensitivity and a life of prayer close to the reality around us. We will be prepared to make decisions of greater personal austerity, avoiding consumerism, the lure of novelty, luxury... and we will know how to renounce unnecessary goods that, in our professional situation, we could perhaps afford. We will thus be receptive to personal change, to opening our ears to the Holy Spirit and listening to what he tells us through poverty.

Christ's relationship with those in need is one-on-one. Certainly, collective works are necessary, but charity is personal because our relationship with God is personal. In a mature Christian, the unfolding of the works of mercy^[21] lived personally happens organically, like a tree that, as it grows, produces more fruit and shade. From this perspective, one can also perceive the complementarity that exists between the various manifestations of the personal apostolate and generosity with the needy.

St. Josemaría described the social transcendence of personal charity in the middle of the world, referring to the example of the faithful of the early Church. "This is how the first Christians acted. They did not have, due to their supernatural vocation, social or human programs to complete; but they were imbued with a spirit, a conception of life and of the world, that could not fail to have consequences in the society in which they lived."^[22]

The collective dimension

I do not want to stop expressing gratitude for the good you do through the initiatives inspired by St. Josemaría, and for those of you who, also inspired by him, work in different organizations that provide direct service to those most in need. I think of that young priest taking care of the poor and the sick in Madrid in the 1930s. The “stone fallen into the lake” [23] has had a wide impact. Although we are aware of our limitations, we thank God and ask for his help to improve and continue.

Collective works keep Christian social sensitivity alive and are a civil and public expression of mercy. As the Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church says, “in so many aspects the neighbor to be loved is found ‘in society’” and “to love him on the social level means, depending on the situations, to make use of social mediations to improve his life or to remove social factors that cause his indigence. It is undoubtedly an act of love, the work of mercy by which one responds here and now to a real and impelling need of one's neighbor, but it is an equally indispensable act of love to strive to organize and structure society so that one's neighbor will not find himself in poverty, above all when this becomes a situation within which an immense number of people and entire populations must struggle, and when it takes on the proportions of a true worldwide social issue.”[24]

St. Josemaría reminded us that “Opus Dei must be present wherever there is poverty, wherever there is unemployment, wherever there is sadness, wherever there is pain so that the pain may be borne with cheerfulness, the poverty may disappear, the unemployment may be overcome — because we form people in a way that helps them hold jobs — and so Christ may enter into the life of each person, to the extent he or she wants, because we are friends of freedom.”[25]

With the limitations inherent to human institutions, the collective works promoted by the faithful of Opus Dei also try to incarnate and express the spirit of service in the social sphere.

In your activity, all the dimensions we have considered come together: spiritual foundation, professional work and care for those in need as a group (social charity) in which the dignity of each person is affirmed (personal charity). It thus unites the necessary professional competence in an area that requires more and more specialization, with the Christian spirit expressed in the works of mercy. It could be said that those of you who promote or collaborate with these works aspire to be Samaritans and innkeepers at the same time.

On the other hand, every collective work, not only those directly perceived as “social,” can have an explicit social dimension, in concern for the environment, goals related to serving others, the way of relating to the poor, an intention of reconciling the world with God... Any collective work of Christian inspiration (a school, college, university, business school, hospital, residence, etc.), even if its immediate mission does not consist of caring for the needy, must integrate in its ethos this central feature of Christianity which is social charity.

In this sense, it is only logical that each collective work will often question itself about the practical and tangible expressions of its social contribution and service to the most needy. That contribution is a connatural effect of the activity itself, not a mere add-on. It is worth asking, “Since this initiative started, what social needs has it sought to meet? How has it improved the environment?” Our Lord is asking us, using the imagination of charity, to reflect on this aspect of every endeavor.

The centenary of Opus Dei (2028-2030) on the horizon

The coming years offer a special opportunity to revitalize our service to the needy in personal or collective ways, with greater awareness of its importance in St. Josemaría's message. In this regard, the ideas and proposals coming from those of you who dedicate yourselves directly to this field are especially valuable.

Along with the themes that you will propose, I suggest two possible lines of reflection.

Working with others. St. Josemaría always encouraged the faithful of the Work to open up like a fan, to work with many other people, including non-Catholics and non-Christians, in service projects. Globalization means that the distribution of resources, migrations, the lack of access to education, the concatenation of economic crises, pandemics, and other challenges affect more and more people. The mutual dependence of the human family is keenly perceived and the world is seen as a shared home. Institutions for development of all kinds are increasingly indispensable, and the idea of collaborating and coordinating knowledge and efforts is gaining force. At a time when suffering is, in a sense, global, we should feel more than ever that we are children of the same Father.

Research and study. Your work places you in observatories from which you can glimpse future trends. This position, together with experience in your areas of development in different cultures and countries, makes it possible to think about specific areas of research and study. This could lead to proposals for best practices, volunteer training programs, consultancy work, congresses and meetings with similar institutions (whether due to their subjects or regional affinities), partnerships with academic centers in order to study social issues from different perspectives, combining field work with academic research. These possibilities recall the aspiration of St. Josemaría, who saw Christians “in ipso ortu rerum novarum,” at the very origin of social changes.

I would like to conclude with more powerful and stimulating words from St. Josemaría: “A man or a society that does not react to suffering and injustice and makes no effort to alleviate them is still distant from the love of Christ's heart. While Christians enjoy the fullest freedom in finding and applying various solutions to these problems, they should be united in having one and the same desire to serve mankind. Otherwise their Christianity will not be the word and life of Jesus; it will be a fraud, a deception of God and man.”^[26]

May the reflection that you are beginning today, in view of the centenary of the Work, serve to go deeper into this call from our founder, and to make it specific on the spiritual and personal level, in professional work, and in all the social and educational initiatives that, in one way or another, are inspired by his message. In this field, as in others, St. Josemaría's words can be applied: everything is done, and everything remains to be done. He would surely encourage us to continue dreaming.

* Some considerations on Christian social action in the light of St. Josemaría's message. Lecture given on September 29, 2022 in Rome at the #BeToCare day, attended by 200 social entrepreneurs from 30 countries.

[1] Javier Echevarría, conference “The Christian Heart, Motor of Social Development,” October 2012, Pontifical University of the Holy Cross.

[2] Ibid.

[3] Benedict XVI, Caritas in veritate, 29-06-2009, no. 53, emphasis in the original.

[4] Fernando Ocáriz, Pastoral Letter, 14-II-2017, no. 31.

[5] Ibid.

[6] Francis, General Audience, 2-IX-2020.

[7] St. John Paul II, encyclical Evangelium vitae, 25-III-1995, no. 19.

[8] St. Josemaría, The Collected Letters (Vol. I), critical edition with notes, Scepter Publishers, London 2021, Letter no. 3, 37d, p. 173.

[9] Mt 25:40.

[10] St. Josemaría Escrivá, Christ is Passing By, “Christian respect for persons and their freedom,” no. 71.

[11] Fernando Ocáriz, Pastoral Letter, 14-II-2017, no. 31.

[12] St. Josemaría, Furrow, no. 827.

[13] Francis, Message for the Fourth World Day for the Poor, 14-XI-2021.

[14] Cfr. Benedict XVI, encyclical Deus caritas est, 25-XII-2005, no. 20.

[15] St. Josemaría, Conversations with Mons. Escrivá de Balaguer, no. 56.

[16] Cfr. St. John Paul II, encyclical Sollicitudo rei socialis, 30-XII-1987, no. 36.

[17] St. Josemaría, Letters (Vol. I), Letter no. 3, 38a and 38b, pp. 173-174.

[18] Cfr. Lk 10:33.

[19] Cfr. Rom 13:8-10.

[20] St. Josemaría, Letter 24-X-1942, no. 44: AGP, series A.3, 91-7-2.

[21] Cfr. Catechism of the Catholic Church, no. 2447.

[22] St. Josemaría, Letter 9-I-1959, no. 22.

[23] St. Josemaría, The Way, no. 831.

[24] Compendium of the Social Doctrine of the Church, no. 208.

[25] St. Josemaría, Una mirada hacia el futuro desde el corazón de Vallecas, Madrid, 1998, p. 135 (words pronounced on 1-X-1967).

[26] St. Josemaría, Christ is Passing By, no. 167.

Back to Contents